CPS Parents Hold Roundtable Discussion About How CPS, CTU and the Mayor's Office Must Realign Around Kids

*Kids First Chicago's Parent Advisory Board Calls for Renewed Focus on Students Amid
CPS Turmoil*

Chicago, IL – Parents who serve on Kids First Chicago Parent Advisory Board (PAB) met with members of the media on Tuesday to share their perspectives on the most pressing concerns in Chicago's education system.

Parents underscored their frustration with being sidelined in conversations about the future of CPS, while kids remain far behind academically and socially-emotionally.

"It was at a recent K1C PAB meeting when we all realized we are being distracted by contracts and things of that nature – not the fact that [only] 30% of our students are reading at grade level," said Katrina Adams, a parent of three from the South Side.

They demanded an immediate commitment to putting kids first amid tense contract negotiations between CPS and CTU. They also stressed the need to bring parents in as real thought partners in devising solutions.

"We are the people who are going to be impacted by these decisions, and we should be the people making them...we can't have real compensation discussions about contracts without including parents' voices," said Maria Owens, a grandparent from the South Side who also serves as the Vice Chair on the Hirsch High School Local School Council (LSC).

"I think we do a good job of normalizing loss of learning. It's always a situation where we're focusing on the problem versus actually fixing it," said Clent Lewis, a Humboldt Park parent and member of the Moos Elementary LSC.

The parents called on CPS to ensure that meaningful accountability measures exist and that CPS communicates honestly about where students are.

"I think that parents need to understand what kids need to learn and know at different grade levels. How do we get parents on board? How do we teach them that? It starts at the primary level. You can't get kids at 5th and 6th grade and call a parent in and decide that you want to do an intervention then. In most cases, that's too late," said Cata Truss, a West Side grandparent of six CPS students.

Parents asked that CPS and its schools provide full transparency by sharing comprehensive student performance data with families—not just celebrating the wins but also demonstrating where more support is needed for students who are furthest behind.

Generally, parents expressed a desire for more communication and cooperation between their kids' schools and parents.

“At our school, we have been having problems with unsafe traffic posing a danger to kids during drop off and pick up. After 97 emails and three years, we finally got approval for our suggestion that high school students, who share the building with our elementary students, get volunteer credit for helping the younger kids into cars,” said Lilia Guevara, an Acero-Garcia High School and Chicago Military Academy parent. “We’re telling you what we need, how to fix it and it’s still not happening. So if that’s just with traffic safety, then what about things like academics and everything else?”

The parents also had demands for the newly-elected and soon-to-be-appointed CPS board members to put aside distractions and focus on implementing strategies that address the academic issues students are facing head-on.

“If the Elected School Board had the makeup of Local School Councils, we would have had guaranteed seats on the board for parents. They would be able to address the needs of our parents as well as our students,” said DePriest Elementary parent Claiborne Wade. “Without having guaranteed seats for parents, we can’t be sure our perspective will be included. Parents can run, but without campaign spending limits they will be outspent.”

“What can the board do within its purview to make sure that parents are supported so that our kids can get what they need?” said Mykela Collins, a parent at Payton High School and Manierre Elementary School. “A lot of what we’re seeing with social-emotional learning or the lack thereof in classrooms has to do with what did or didn’t happen at home during COVID.”

Resources for schools and teachers has been a huge hurdle in the current CPS/CTU contract negotiations. While all students will be impacted in the battle for resources, parents of IEP students comprising 16% of the district are very concerned that their vulnerable kids will be left behind.

“If a student has an IEP and they’re already behind, they’re not going to catch up. They’re saying we don’t have the resources to pay for the teacher that the kids need or the help or the support that they need to be able to catch up,” said Guadalupe Ojeda, a Northwest Side parent with kids at Inter-American Elementary Magnet School and Senn High School. “So every six months or every year they meet and it’s the same thing.”

Katrina Adams also felt that enrichment programs were not equitably distributed across CPS. She believes these types of programs help students catch up academically. Adams said, “Some CPS schools do have [enrichment programs]. People up North have enrichment programs at kindergarten and 1st grade. But on the South side, after-school programs and enrichment programs do not start [until] 5th and 6th grade. That is too late. Early exposure is the key.”

The parents made the point that any agreement must be fiscally responsible so as not to jeopardize the district's future. They also stressed that accountability must be at the heart of any new CTU contract. This accountability ranges from transparency around how schools and kids are performing to tying increased compensation to performance and student outcomes.

"I think that if we as a community demand that you just use what you've got in a way that works, that's what is important," said Maria Owens. "Of course, the more funding available, the better. But even without that, just take what you have and try to make it work."

"Figure out what's the best practices for students, because a lot of students are behind. Parents are not supported, schools are not supported," said Mykela Collins. "So we must get it through our head, that we're all a partnership. Our children won't prosper if we don't work together."
